This course examines the geographical dimensions of international terrorism and security. It investigates the geographic factors that contribute to creating active regions of terrorism, insurgent states, and terrorist targets around the world. Within the security context, the course examines U.S. and international policy on event mitigation, response, and recovery. Issues of surveillance and access to public information relative to individual freedoms are also discussed.

Meets university international (IR) requirement